Adobe Photoshop Elements is a good alternative for beginners. I also discuss the pros and cons of using Photoshop versus Elements in the upcoming section "Evaluating Photoshop for beginners." Phew. That was a lot. And I'm just getting started. Getting to the heart of this free online photo editor — and what it can do for you — is the topic of this chapter. If you just want to see how I work Photoshop today, check out the first part of this chapter and the screen shots at `www.digital-photography-for-dummies.com/ps/part1.shtml`. Cleaning up color with the Adjustment Panel This section opens with the first part of this chapter, which explains how to work with the Adjustment Panel to correct brightness and color in your images — and how to use the tools in the panel to reduce noise, correct exposure, and sharpen images. The Adjustment Panel is shown in Figure 5-1. Figure 5-1: The Adjustment Panel is your one-stop-shop for color corrections. Figure 5-1 shows the three keys in the Adjustment Panel, and Figure 5-2 shows the color and brightness sliders in the panel. Figure 5-2: Although a slider is shown here, click the Toolbox icon for a full-screen view with actual sliders. Making small color adjustments Make color adjustments one area at a time. Adjusting brightness, contrast, and other adjustments to an entire image at a time wreaks havoc. Togglle the Red, Green, and Blue (RGB) sliders to make the necessary adjustments individually. (You can also layer these adjustments by clicking the layer thumbnail in the Layers panel to open the Adjustment layer. Layer masks are covered in Chapter 12.) The slider knob doesn't represent a real image but instead is used to provide you with the best point to start from. If you start too far in the direction, the transition will feel abrupt, and the whole image will look different when you click the OK button. If you start too far in the other direction, the image will be too light or dark to notice the differences, and the transition will feel smooth. Figure 5-3 shows a cropped image with both brightness and contrast adjusted; notice how the resulting adjusted image still looks like the original image. (I labeled a few things in the figure for you

What's New In?

Friday, December 16, 2016 I was out on a late run this morning. I'd been cold/fluy for a couple of days and I just wanted to feel better. As I was running it felt like the runners were getting passed me even though there were other people out there. I listened to my GPS, and noted my speed just to make sure I knew where I was at. It told me I was running 17:18 miles. As I was getting close to home I recognized someone in another running group. She had a Garmin watch and she was running as fast as I was. I caught up to her and asked what her average speed was. She then told me her average was 17:06, which for a 6-mile run was pretty damn fast! I decided to try it. The average is for 5K, I told her. I figure if you can do a 5K in 17:06 that's 10K in 18:44. Sure enough, I did it on my next run. I've had similar results as someone else (in groups with people who run further distances in a day) who's been averaging 18:10 and has clocked me at 18:13. I'm about 2:30 off her time and I'm faster in a 6 mile run than she is in a 5K. I just don't understand that. I'm trying to understand. I think I'm getting closer to it. What's happening is my running experience has become broadened as a result of running longer distances and doing longer runs. When I was a road runner I was 5-6 miles long most days and averaging about 20 minutes. And I ran pretty well. I was middle-of-the-pack in my age group. I had friends that ran farther than me and could do it faster, but I just didn't have it in me. Now I've been doing the 12 mile runs and longer runs. I'm running slower than I was in the past, but I'm in the same ranking of one of the fastest in my age group. I'm still getting passed by many runners but many are slower than me and I'm running slower than I was when I was a road runner. That's what's happening to me. I'm slowing down some, which is good. I don't need to be running as fast as I can to get faster (well, that
