Up-to-date information on modern.Q: Diagrams: Modeling modality of proof Let $\vdash$ be any reasonable set of inference rules. My question is: Given a sentence $φ$, is there a diagram D such that $D\models φ$? More specifically, there are two fragments of diagram logic which are non-trivial and I would be interested in such a result. The first one states that if two sentences in the same domain are contradictory, then the diagram cannot model the intuition that they are logically contradictory. The second one states that, when two sentences are contradictory, there is a diagram that models that intuition. There are various negations of this question: Is there an adequate counterexample in a diagram? Can we prove a sentence $φ$ being logically contradictory in any reasonable diagram? Is there a diagram that can model arbitrary intuition? A: I'm going to refer to the Kripke-Kleene model-theoretic approach to modal logic, but many of the points raised above carry over to the logistic approach. The following answers all questions in the affirmative. To begin with, we need an intuitively acceptable semantics. Since we assume only that we want a reasonable semantics, there are going to be a wide variety of possible semantics for 'proving' that $φ$ is a tautology. A nice way of expressing what we want is to say that we require a semantics such that if $φ$ is a logical truth of the logic on question, then the diagram D under discussion is a proper model of $φ$, and otherwise it is not. To say that D is a model of $φ$ means exactly that if $D(A)$
